The Literific is a great society, that is what I truly believe, - but I also know that it can be greater.

Why not aim high? Let our ambition only be matched by our fervour for making this society all that it can be.

I'm standing to be your next President because I know that this society can be so much more than it already is, and I am confident that I can deliver on making that dream a reality. I want to build upon the strong foundation of my predecessor Daniel, and ensure that our members' experience at debates are even more fun, entertaining and meaningful. A lively and welcoming atmosphere is what any notable society needs to thrive.

Secondly, I want to enhance the prestige of the society, making it a national name across Ireland and the UK, one that is enjoyable to be a member of, but is recognised for its contribution to public debate and genuine dialogue. I'm glad that as Events Officer, I will have organised the largest series of LitTalks yet, with a high calibre of guests to our society. As President, I will embody that same excellence, and apply it to all that I do.

Lastly, I want to be a President that engages and listens, a society can never be improved by just one person. But when people come together, to aim to achieve an ideal that they could never do alone, that is when real distinction is realised.
